Proton-gated channels in the adrenal chromaffin cell: mechanical force and voltage sensitivity. Cholinergic innervation of the adrenal medulla regulates the secretion of catecholamines by the chromaffin cells. These cells possess voltage-gated channels and may be opened and closed by changes in membrane potential. Alternatively, channels with a proton-dependent conductance may be involved. Application of a mechanical stretch to the outer surface of an isolated adrenal medullary cell causes a rise in cytoplasmic free $\text{Ca}(2+)$ concentration, suggesting the presence of a stretch-activated channel. Inhibition of the guanylate cyclase/cGMP pathway inhibits the rise in $\text{Ca}(2+)$ and attenuates acetylcholine-induced secretion. Here we have examined possible roles for proton-gated $\text{Ca}(2+)$ channels in the production of secretory responses in perforated-patch whole cell voltage clamp recordings. Mechanical stretch evoked a nonlinear $\text{Ca}(2+)$
