The size of each text is greater than a normal text, it's because it's rich text. How can I replace the text with my actual text? A: You can use string.replace to replace the occurrence of the string with the actual string: import re s = 'Pendejasnenasmuychiquitaspornxxx' r = re.compile(r'w{3}[^\w]') m = r.sub('XXX', s) Result: 'Pendejasnenasmuychiquitaspornxxx XXX'
Fiber lasers based on ZnSe/ZnS-coated microribbons: a new perspective to the physics and applications of highly nonlinear optical materials. We demonstrate a novel concept for fiber lasers based on microribbons of ZnSe-coated microfibers of ZnS. The ZnSe/ZnS-coated microribbons show strong optical nonlinearities when pumped at wavelengths of several hundred nanometers and are also highly absorbing. We show that the physics of these materials and their broad spectra absorption and nonlinearities are strongly different from the more common dielectric coated core/cladding fibers, offering a new perspective for the future use of core/shell nanoribbons. In addition, the coated ribbons can be significantly thinned to achieve larger Brillouin lasing in optical fibers, as is needed for compact high-power fiber lasers and amplifiers.Q: Implementing the Google app engine "built-in" logging mechanism? I've been playing around with the development environment and the logging mechanism built in Google app engine. It's a really nice environment, but it seems to me that my life would be a lot easier if I could integrate this logging mechanism with my existing logging infrastructure, either by grabbing a socket from the container or by providing my own logging source and writing it out to the socket. Is it possible to do this and, if so, how can I do it? (I'm not talking about logging to a file or database that will be queried later, just plain simple output) A: The logging mechanism is not designed to receive messages from a third party. You would have to write your own app that communicates with your own logging framework on port 80. The importance of
