The development of universal genetic markers for chloroplast (plastid) DNA sequences has had two main aims, both of which have been successfully achieved. The first is to characterize the plastids of different plant species and to understand the phylogenetic relationships among different plastids. Secondly, it should provide markers that distinguish species-specific chloroplast DNA sequences. This report describes how a plastid system for algae has been developed in which host cells are used to control plastid replication and to maintain recombinant plastid DNA sequences (mT31). Using this system, attempts have been made to determine the phylogenetic relationships among chlorella and algae plastids. more responsibly, or, how many of you are ready to take that responsibility? You are all basically married to the idea of guaranteed income. No one I know needs a job with benefits. In fact, most of us don't even like working. JACK I agree that SS is the problem. The right plan would be that if you want to keep paying for your insurance in retirement, you should be forced to pay back what you'll be receiving from SS, while you work. I don't know who would do that, but I'm sure it could be arranged. G.M. and Tess. it's great to hear from you both. Each of you has a different perspective on the problem. Tess is concerned about the broken system that's in place now. She rightly says you're making a big bet that it won't change even though it has many times. Jack says he's not so worried about it, because at least it won't change into something worse. Of course, anything that gets worse is generally a good thing for the goose that lays the golden egg.
