A Study in Steampunk is an interactive thriller, where your choices drive the story. Every protagonist, every major and minor character, every location, every situation is controlled by your choices. Take control of the Empire or risk its fall. Become a secret agent or mastermind a revolution from within. Make your choice and the fate of the Empire will be yours. On the streets of London, in the halls of the court, and between the wires of the railroads, the lives and deaths of an empire hang in the balance of your choices. The choice you make will decide what you will be: King or Queen. Conqueror or Defender. Hero or Assassin. Your Path Is Yours! About This Game: Choice by Gaslight: The Fate of the Empire is the third in a series of interactive fiction novels written by Heather Albano and illustrated by Elizabeth Knobel. Since the Day of the Plague, when the undead rose from the mists of time and stalked the mortal world, the Vlaski Empire has conquered London, New York, Paris, and above all, Constantinople--first by declaring its enemies decadent, then by enslaving them. Having established its dominion, the Empire is now attempting to consolidate its rule and push back into the shadows the last vestiges of reason and science. But most of all, it wants to keep its secret--the ability to call down the dark powers of undeath. Weakened by a series of defeats and painful torture, the Empire's military and secret police are vulnerable. And now, spies and freelance agents are the only weapons left to the resistance. Thirteen in all, each a master of their own deadly speciality, they are a dwindling force--but one that makes no mistake: The fate of the Empire hangs in the balance. And now it's up to you to choose its destiny. The availability and use of hydrogen fuel cells are increasingly promising means to provide electrical power for transportation vehicles. Hydrogen fuel cells provide a means to convert hydrogen into electricity. The electricity can then be used to operate electric motors that may be included within the transportation vehicles. Hydrogen fuel cells can generate electricity using hydrogen fuel and oxygen in air to produce water and electricity. The electrodes of a fuel cell stack include a negative plate and a positive plate separated by a membrane electrolyte. The electrolyte, also called a solid polymer electrolyte ("SPE"), transports the protons, but may be in contact with the reactants (Hydrogen fuel and oxygen) without reacting with them. The reactants can therefore be fed to the fuel cells through channels formed in the plates, which are referred to as gas diffusion layers ("GDLs"). Typically, the gas diffusion layer would include channels to distribute the gases at the electrodes of the fuel cell stack. The contacts to the GDLs within the plate are typically disposed on a plate perimeter of the plate. The contacts are typically made of metal to electrically connect the fuel cell stacks to other components within the transportation vehicles, such as the vehicle control systems. Plates with apertures that allow the contacts to be aligned with the GDLs can be fabricated by stamping or by laser cutting. A typical plate construction process requires that all of the apertures, which are necessarily a predetermined distance apart, be uniformly spaced across the plate. However, when the apertures are stamped into a plate, the apertures may be relatively large and the amount of space between the apertures can be relatively large. As a result, there can be significant material waste, particularly at the perimeter of the plate, which can reduce the strength of the plate. Another drawback to a stamped plate design may include a potentially insufficient number of contact holes. In this case c9d1549cdd
