The gameplay technology provides players with more control while playing the game, both in terms of their movement and in dictating the flow of the game. Players' in-game character movements are now more agile and realistic. Several new animations have been added to the player's running and shooting, bringing a more athletic feel to these features. Players now have more control over their horizontal and vertical trajectory by twisting and turning more precisely to avoid tackles, headers and other ball-related situations. In addition, players have greater control of their pace as the new pedaling system allows players to accelerate and brake more naturally, making it easier to manoeuvre and find space. EA Sports has also expanded the number of actions available for skillshots, including the new, aforementioned Ultra Boost Pass. Players can now use the Multi-Knee Shot from different angles. And the ability to collect and score the long range through-ball has been improved. Players can now perform tricks after a shot by spinning the ball into play, or use the Authentic Manoeuvre to rapidly move the ball with hand-to-hand actions. The new Cruising Aid tackle is featured as the ultimate ball-carrier aid, and by sending the ball into the air with the new 'End of Match' action, players can end a match with a "restart" to play against a fresh opponent. FIFA 22 also features a new damage system that provides a more authentic experience in the midst of a fast, full-contact match. Players now take more damage on tackle hits, can get injured when landing on hard surfaces, and are subject to more stoppage time-related damage. FIFA 22 introduces a new blood system as players now bleed more naturally, and take more damage when directly involved in long-distance collisions. Players can also tear a muscle in a leg when tackled, with this injury taking more time to heal. These changes allow players to feel more vulnerable and in pain, especially in more physical games. When injured, players take longer to shake it off, meaning that they will not be able to play the next game. FIFA 22 introduces a set of all-new matches and modes, including new modes and a new Diamond Cup season mode in the FIFA Ultimate Team series. The FIFA Ultimate Team series will now have more ways to compete with your friends
