For example, I'm running Python 2.7.3, but when I run a Python script which references Python 2.6.5, how does it know that it can only be run using the Python 2.7.3 and not the Python 2.6.5, because the script seems to run with the same version of Python that it was compiled with (Python 2.7.3). If Python were to resolve the version and path of the Python script prior to executing it, is there a way to fool this? Thanks, and sorry for the layman question. A: The interpreter looks at the Python script file in order to figure out which interpreter to use. It also looks at the shebang line. This is what tells the interpreter which interpreter to use. So for example: import sys print(sys.version) This is used in the shebang line of the script, telling the interpreter what version to look for the scripts: #!/usr/bin/env python # -- coding: utf-8 -- The Kurdish people have an intricate history with the Ottoman Empire. They have been under Ottoman control for nearly 1,000 years. The Kurdish language is an Indo-European language. It is closely related to the languages of Uzbekistan and Iran. (Turkic is somewhat related, but is not considered to be an Indo-European language.) When World War I started, the Ottomans began to create a separate state called "Iraq." The "Arab Spring" altered this scheme. After

Saddam Hussein was found guilty of atrocities against his own citizens, the U.S. created a military "No Fly Zone" over Iraq. The term "Kurds" is derived from the Turkish word kurdu/
