What do you think? Month: January 2016 Image credit: steveandholly (not the one I actually used, but similar enough). Does it seem that everything comes to you as an easy-to-remember URL? I swear, that's not even a legit of a URL; go to any of these and they will redirect to this instead. For the past few years, I've been changing my passwords every 30 days or so. The reason for this is that every 60 days, you will have to change your password on whichever site you use it. Here's a question for you: Is there any negative consequences to doing this? For most websites, no. However, a few I've run across have felt the need to remind you that you are to update your password regularly. You can either be given the option to have the website contact you or a tool in the user interface that will remind you of this.

In late adolescence; and young adulthood are associated with positive changes in PPI, due to new opportunities for learning in this period of life. In the first analysis, we found a positive correlation between PPI and SEL-E. This result is consistent with previous studies on measures of SEL, as well as those using a sample of the same age ([@B3]; [@B12]).

Second, we found that PPI explained a significant amount of variance in the data (adjusted $R^2 = 0.18$). However, when SEL-E was included in the model, the amount of explained variance was decreased to a non-significant 4% of variance. This means that the newly proposed model has less explanatory power than the one with SEL-E. Finally, in the second analysis, we tried to replicate the results found in the first study with a sample of older adults; we found a similar pattern of results as in the first analyses. However, there are a few notable exceptions. In the final model, we found a positive relation of PPI with SEL-E, and a negative relation of PPI with college GPA, similar to the first study. In the second study, we found a positive relation of PPI with LS and a negative relation with the income of the participant's parents. The results of the mixed-model analysis reflect the interaction that was found in the correlational analysis. The study revealed that the relation between
