No hard feelings for Jen, it seems. The villagers wave happily and throw the rest of them a small meal and a bed. The food is unappetizing, but there is plenty of it and it is a welcome change from their frozen, half-rotten meals. They settle in for the night. The trek has taken a toll on them and they all need their rest. They set up their camp and sleep, all except Chirs and Nancy, who climb to the top of a tree to have a look at the stars. Jacob and David, who have just come down, wander in the jungle checking for tracks. Chirs takes readings for altimeters and compass and determines their trajectory has followed the path of the river. They continue walking in the direction the river has taken them, following its icy cold waters. They are now deep in the jungle, and have yet to find a way out to the sea. How are they going to find Kiel, when they're lost in the middle of the Amazon jungle? David interrupts their conversation and points up into the tree. "Look!" It's the first time in the entire journey where the characters have seen a bird, or anything but a thin thread of sky and darkness. "What is that?" someone asks. David points off to the east. "An enormous bird!" Nancy exclaims, watching the huge dark silhouette through the tree
