The innervation of the human aorta was investigated by various staining methods. Autoradiography revealed two types of adrenergic innervation pattern of the human aorta: a discrete system and a plexiform system. The density of the discrete adrenergic innervation was high in the media layer of the aorta, whereas the density of the plexiform adrenergic innervation was high in the adventitia and intima layer. In arteries of 4- to 18-year-old patients without any evidence of atherosclerosis and in patients with atherosclerotic lesions, the density of the plexiform innervation was significantly higher than that in arteries of elderly patients. The density of the discrete adrenergic innervation in arteries of patients with atherosclerotic lesions was lower than in the arteries of patients without atherosclerotic lesions. The present data suggest that the vascular adrenergic innervation in young patients is more evenly distributed than that in elderly patients and that the vessels in patients with atherosclerosis are less innervated than those in patients without atherosclerosis.
