Sudden bursts of traffic, such as news stories, sports updates, and stock reports, cause network congestion and may result in loss of network communications. Because of the packet-by-packet nature of the Internet, bandwidth is consumed quickly and, if left unaddressed, may result in network congestion for periods of time that last for hours or even days. If the network is ever saturated, or near saturation, however, then new data will be delayed at the sites and data loss or service interruption will result. Network throughput and flow control are important to ensure that data packets are transmitted and received in a timely manner. A number of solutions have been proposed that include including firewalls, routers, and soft diskless hosts. Firewalls prevent attacks on clients or the network and are typically installed and managed by the network administrator. Firewalls typically determine whether or not to allow incoming traffic and to where the traffic is allowed to flow. Unfortunately, firewalls are large and expensive and are difficult to maintain in a large network. Routers are network devices that route data packets. The routers may determine the next node in a path of the data packets, determine the cost or quality of the route, and may build a data packet path through the network using multiple routes. The routing software is also large and expensive and is difficult to maintain in a large network. Soft diskless hosts (as opposed to hard disk-based hosts) do not require a disk drive, thereby allowing cost and space savings in network nodes. However, the architecture of these hosts does not scale well for larger hosts and
