Thanks! Photon upconversion in a semiconductor medium with nonlinear polarization. We present a brief review of an extremely powerful concept for energy conversion in inorganic semiconductor material. In a nanostructured material, coupling of a one-photon excitation to a two-photon emission (two-photon upconversion) becomes possible, which can be exploited for converting electromagnetic radiation of certain frequencies and wavelengths into other frequencies with much higher efficiency. Upconversion is utilized for a class of technical applications ranging from high-efficiency photovoltaic cells to biosensors. As a general description, this concept is based on the increase of the occupation probability of energy levels of a semiconductor by a second-order nonlinear process. Strong coupling between a single photon and coherent states in a semiconductor with a general nonlinear response was the first experimental demonstration of the concept. A semiconductor light-emitting diode (LED) demonstrates the technological potential of the concept. We show that applications of this concept in nanosystems are possible. In the context of two-photon upconversion, we discuss how quantum interference of the many-body exciton states can increase the efficiency by orders of magnitude.

DESCRIPTION: It is the intent of this application to describe a program designed to generate a broad pool of candidates for pre- and post-doctoral training to enter careers in the field of pediatric gastroenterology. Training will occur in the laboratories of seven faculty members from six departments in the School of Medicine in a combined effort to provide a cross-disciplinary approach to the study of the digestive tract. The principle areas of research focus for the proposal are 1) biochemistry and cell biology of mucosal defense, 2) regulation and ontogeny of intestinal stem cells, 3) regulation of synaptic transmission and neuroendocrine functions, 4) molecular genetics of intestinal development and function, 5) regulatory mechanisms of intestinal morphogenesis, and 6) mechanisms of mucosal immune tolerance. In addition to their research capabilities, the faculty investigators are committed to teaching and training of young scientists. Those individuals deemed to be best suited for this training program will be selected based on their demonstrated ability to develop proficiency in research and in their basic laboratory skills, their commitment to a career in academic medicine, and their promise for success as independent investigators. The program will include in vivo and in vitro research, courses, seminars, and research presentations. Trainees will carry out an initial one

Characteristics of coronaviruses in the two species of the group of the avian coronaviruses. The group of avian coronaviruses possess three types of strains: A, B and C. The strains in the A and B groups are involved in the poult enteritis and mortality syndrome (PEMS) of chickens, while the strain in the C group induces severe enteritis and kidney damage in chickens. The genomes of the avian coronaviruses have been cloned and sequenced. Comparison of the sequences of the cloned genomes and the genome sequences of the isolated strains showed that the strains of the A and B groups could be divided into three subtypes, A1, A2 and B1, while the strain of the C group is genetically homogeneous. The phylogenetic analysis suggested that the avian coronaviruses are closely related to the feline coronaviruses and the human
