What's new in Rogue Bit:

Fish by AVG In the past I've been the first to purchase the latest and greatest AE86 parts and race them as fast as I could. Sure there was the E32 gi, but who doesn't want to make their car 'worthy' of the AE86 badge? However, my love affair with the E34 (or M10 to those were privileged enough to race them) grew more than some parts. I began to appreciate the simplicity as well as the overall styling and all around fun factor of the E34. Regardless, I still wanted more aftermarket support for my beloved AE86. Thus, with time, I put aside my E34 for the AE86. This is especially true when it comes to exhaust parts. I wish I could say I'd read up extensively on exhausts, but I've never let that happen, it took me forever to realize many that I considered as 'hard core' were easier on the eyes and easier to read in small quantities, but still not as dramatic as the earlier models. With that being said, I've never owned a fresh exhaust on the AE86 to this day. But I will say, I can't really identify a bad exhaust nowadays, just different classes of great and less-great. When my car finally was able to pull a convincing exhale, sure enough I became an instant fan of the stock exhaust in the AE86, but I didn't want to get stuck with that. I've finally become much more of a fan of underhood dynamics (or a lack there of). This is why my wish list for any exhaust on the AE86 is to have unobstructed and maximum fun. When it comes to exhaust I try to keep the physical layout of the exhaust, in small quantities, as close to stock as I can. In terms of design I want it to be symmetrical, attractive and minimize visual distractions for the observer on the road. So when looking at potential exhausts I include the stock, static and what really interests me the most, namely aftermarket designs (typically from the first two generations of the AE86). Who knows, maybe someday I'll get the chance to own an AE86 and carve out some time to enjoy it fully on the tarmac. Until then, the best way that I've found to perform with my AE86, is to drive it, feel it, and adjust my driving skills to match how the car handles. Well... I just want it to
