What's New In Adobe Photoshop CC 2014?

This invention relates to a stacking apparatus and method for stacking a plurality of objects for storage. A number of different types of stacking apparatus and stacking methods have been developed in the past, all providing for stacking one object on top of another on a generally horizontal support surface. The most common stacking methods involve stacking a plurality of stacked objects one on top of the other on a single horizontal stacking support surface. Each object is generally horizontal with a width dimension that is larger than that of the stacking support surface. For example, as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,912,946, an object can be placed on a stacking support surface that is horizontally disposed with a pair of rods that are movable into and out of the stacking support surface. The object rests on top of a support surface for a first end portion of the object to engage the rods. The object is then lifted by rotating the rods to pull the first end portion of the object up off the support surface. The rods are then retracted to lift the second end portion of the object up off the support surface. This movement of the rods is repeated until all of the portions of the object are stored on the stacking support surface. U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,964,303 and 4,051,907 disclose another stacking apparatus where objects are stacked one on top of the other. The stacking apparatus includes a horizontal support surface on which stacks of the objects are supported. A lifting mechanism is mounted between the support surface and a pair of lifting rollers. The lifting mechanism moves a plurality of rows of objects off the support surface to the rollers. The rollers grasp the objects by friction as the rollers roll on the surface of the stacked objects. The lifting mechanism is then moved away from the stack of objects to pull the stack of objects up. The lifting mechanism is then returned to the stack of objects and the rollers are rolled back to drop the stack of objects down to the support surface. U.S. Pat. Nos. 2,962,947 and 3,064,888 disclose another type of stacking apparatus. The stacking apparatus includes a supporting table, a feed table, and two support frames. The two support frames are disposed above and below the supporting table and the feed table. When a stack of objects is placed on the feed table, the two support frames are moved into position between the feed table and the supporting table. The support frames are then moved upwardly to create a gap between
