Q: If an element is empty in a list, why aren't they considered a substring? I don't understand why this produces false positives. I'm only inserting two elements into the list a, but the first two are detected as starting and ending strings: >>> a = [{"x", "y"}, {"z", "z"}, {"y"}, {"z", "x"}] >>> a[0][0] = "" >>> a[1][0] = "" >>> >>> for i in a: ... if i[0]!="" and i[1]!="": ... print("true") ... true true A: list[:] returns a view of the same list. Modifying the view does not modify the original. Because of this, empty lists are considered (to be precise, the length of the list is considered) to not match either of the two criteria in your test. Since this behavior is unlikely to work as intended in many cases, it is allowed to be slightly (and in this case, very slightly) unpredictable. What you need to do instead is use a if i[0] is not empty and i[1] is not "":. If you want a decent starting point for reading about Sakai, I suggest you start with this paper by Susan Conrad.
