If I had to describe a situation in which one person shares resources with another, what would be the correct verb to use? The most obvious choice would be "to share", but it's a very complicated concept, and I'm not quite sure how to describe this. For example: John has the Windows File Sharing program installed. Jane has Samba installed. They can share Windows files, and also each other's files. There's a lot of nice things you can do with programs like Windows File Sharing. However, they also have some ugly side effects. John uses Windows File Sharing and shares a file with Jane. Jane uses Samba and shares that file with John. I would like to say this, but my English is not very good. Is this the correct usage? A: "Sharing" suggests an ongoing activity, so it doesn't make sense to use it for this kind of situation, and I can't think of any other verbs that convey the same meaning. "Sharing" is normally associated with resources that are shared openly and willingly, which sounds like a situation that's often temporary. You want something that implies that the sharing is ongoing, not just an event. You could say John and Jane use each other's computers for work, which makes some sense. But you're the one doing the sharing, not them, so you're probably using each other's resources. You could say you're accessing each other's shared resources, in which case you're the one accessing the resources, not them (the distinction is subtle, but important). You could say you're using each other's computers/laptops to access your shared resources, in which case you're doing the sharing rather than them, and access is the verb you're looking for. In the situation you describe, you're using each other's resources, not your own. You're not actively accessing resources that belong to your two friends, but rather you're simply using their resources. You would most likely use one of your friend's computers, and you would most likely be doing so indirectly, by sharing a document via email or some other means, instead of downloading the document. The verb you're looking for is "access"
