It becomes clear that his opportunity has passed, but the selection process continues for what remains of the day, mainly thanks to new developments in the Wimbledon quarter-finals. Roger Federer now has a tough opponent to beat in the world number one, in his quarter-final against Novak Djokovic, while Andy Murray - who took the first sets of their semi-final at the All England Club - will be the first Briton to reach the last eight since Fred Perry won the title in 1925. A potential third final for Ferrer could be on the cards if the Spaniard ends up as the first man through, and the repercussions of that announcement could be felt in almost every other quarter-final, with Rafael Nadal facing the winner of the Djokovic-Ferrer contest. In the women's event, it is unlikely that either of the two big favourites will be pushed out on to Centre Court in the second round, but there will be plenty of interest in the battle of the seeded outsiders Maria Sharapova and Timea Bacsinsz 6d1f23a050
