holders are on the verge of winning a legal battle to prevent the public from downloading movies, music and ebooks from the Internet. A High Court ruling is set to reinstate a 1997 law which makes “piracy” - downloading music, movies or other computer files without authorisation – illegal in the UK. The decision, which has the support of the government, means that ISPs would be forced to block websites and route users around the blocks. The only anti-blocking technique is an intrusive block: it slows down Internet connection speeds by slightly congesting the pipes by temporarily delaying the data flow. This method is used by the government of India to stop unwanted files being sent onto their Internet servers. Google, Wikipedia and The Pirate Bay are the only three website which are known to be blocking copyright holders' content. The government, ISPs and the content industries are hoping the case will go to the European Court of Justice next month, but a coalition of anti-blocking groups are hoping a High Court ruling will stop shutting down access to them. A ruling in the case could be handed down next week. Richard Napier-Pearce, of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's communications and information policy division, told BBC News that the blocking of websites is the only way that the industry can be saved. "We are the only industry that is going to be seriously damaged if the blocking is stopped," he said. He added that the right to "copyright" is being eroded by the rise of digital communication and said that it is time "the balance
