urged to 'name and shame' companies who violate hiring policies. The issue has sparked a debate about whether there should be an official state register of employment bias, so companies have to name and shame themselves, or at least the smaller employers who have the most employment opportunities in the social care sector. Politicians could start with the Duchy of Lancaster, which recently published its own guidelines for what it calls 'positive discrimination'. The Duchy's chief executive, Philip Hampton, says that he doesn't
